

It is quite possible to be married and yet lack “Relationship”! Relationship involves the quality of interaction husbands and wives have with one another. It involves being connected in a close, personal, loving, and caring way as you share one another’s life. Many married couples live at the same address but lack relationship. One spouse is going while the other is coming. Couples become two ships passing by one another in broad daylight without noticing each other as they travel along the same body of water within close proximity!

For example, there’s a tendency for the bonds between close high school friends to drift due to a lack of communication. Friendships can easily drift beyond present day relevance when there becomes a lack of calls, contacts, visits, or interactions. This is why some do not even wish to go to their high school reunions. Those relationships in large part have expired. You’re not the same person., they are not the same person, and because so much time has elapsed, the desire for some to reconnect becomes an inconvenience.

The same is true with husbands and wives. Although living at the same address, due to work demands and other burdening responsibilities of life, spouses can easily find themselves on the back burner., not realizing the damage disconnection has supplanted in place of relationship.

The same takes place with regard to our relationship with Christ. After awhile, the desire to worship dwindles because other things have been allowed to slip in between you and He. Some come to worship weary, exhausted, and mentally drained. They’ve given the world or job the best of their effort, time, and focus, leaving crumbs for Christ. Well, just as it’s not right to give the Lord your left overs, it’s not right to give your spouse leftovers, only to rest up for another long day of the same imbalanced routine.

Regular efforts to connect must be implemented into your daily routine. Eat together., go for walks together, run errands together as you discuss life, your day, and share experiences. Get reconnected routinely to keep “relationship” in your marriage!
